At first Greg Davidson thought there was a problem with his printer.

But after the town's residents were found murdered, mutilated in the same chilling fashion his printouts described, he realized he had an even bigger problem. He had moved to a small upstate town, hoping to start his life over after a divorce.

Once a bestselling horror writer, he thought he could pull his career back on track by changing genres and beginning a new novel. Except it seems that Karma has intervened after years of creating nightmares, he has found that he cannot escape them. Has, in fact, stumbled right into one. To make matters worse, the murderers aren't even human. If they were werewolves, vampires, or zombies something right out of a horror novel Greg might at least have an idea how to deal with them. But they aren't.

They are entirely different. Entirely . . . worse. Now Greg must pair up with the only person who doesn't think he's insane his attractive neighbor's teenage son and together they must stop evil before it has a chance to ravage the town and destroy life as they know it, including Greg's second chance at love.
