The wanderer Youngblood ends up in Casablanca, where he works for Abdel, the powerful leader of a human trafficking clan. Youngblood is in charge of safeguarding twelve immigrants smuggled in a freight train from the port of Tangier to Casablanca, where their hopes for a new beginning will be crushed by forced labor and debt slavery.

Youngblood arrives in Casablanca short one passenger—a young Indonesian woman he freed to save her from a horrible destiny at a brothel. He reports that the woman escaped on her own, but Abdel doesn't like loose ends. He tasks Youngblood and the gang's ironfisted head enforcer, Mustapha, to find the woman and bring her back. Youngblood walks on the razor's edge as he helps the woman trapped in Casablanca, unable to leave the country without documents. Each act of kindness tightens the noose around Youngblood's neck and brings Abdel one step closer to discovering the identity of the woman's savior. Youngblood knows it's just a matter of time before he's exposed. The only way to survive is to make his move first—and defy the most ruthless clan in the city.
